

Dr Johnson's Reliquary of Rediscovered Words

The words in the Reliquary have been lost to us for a variety of reasons. Some words have simply fallen out of use because they are no longer needed. For example, the word "abrogate" once meant "to repeal" or "to annul." However, this word is no longer used because the word "repeal" has taken on a broader meaning. Other words have become obsolete because they have been replaced by more modern words. For example, the word "disgruntled" once meant "displeased" or "dissatisfied." However, this word is now rarely used because the word "unhappy" has become more common.

Still other words have become obsolete because they have taken on new meanings. For example, the word "nice" once meant "foolish" or "stupid." However, this word now has a positive connotation, meaning "pleasant" or "agreeable."

The Reliquary helps us to rediscover these lost words and to understand their original meanings. This can help us to better appreciate the richness and diversity of the English language.

The words in the Reliquary can also be a source of inspiration for writers and other creative people. These words can be used to create new and interesting works of literature, art, and music. For example, the word "mellifluous" means "sweet-sounding." This word could be used to describe a beautiful piece of music or a well-written poem. The word "serendipitous" means "occurring by chance." This word could be used to describe a fortunate or unexpected event.

The Reliquary is a treasure trove of words that can be used to inspire and create. It is a valuable resource for anyone interested in the history of the English language, or for anyone who simply loves words.
