The History of American Girl

American Girl was founded in 1986 by Pleasant Rowland. Rowland was a former teacher who was frustrated by the lack of positive role models for girls in the media. She created American Girl to provide girls with dolls and stories that would inspire them to be strong, independent, and kind.

The first American Girl dolls were Felicity Merriman, Josefina Montoya, Kirsten Larson, Addy Walker, and Samantha Parkington. These dolls were all based on real girls who lived in different time periods in American history. Rowland hoped that these dolls would help girls learn about history and culture, and to see themselves in the stories of other girls.

American Girl quickly became a hit with girls and parents alike. The dolls were praised for their historical accuracy, their beautiful designs, and their positive messages. American Girl also began to produce books, movies, and other products that further developed the stories of the dolls and their friends.

Today, American Girl is one of the most popular brands for girls in the world. The company has sold over 100 million dolls and has generated over $1 billion in annual revenue. American Girl has also been recognized for its positive impact on girls' lives. The company has received numerous awards for its products and its commitment to empowering girls.
